Dear Doctor Gloria,

My dad is hooked on Facebook. He cannot help scrolling the feed and keeping himself updated on what is happening around him. He is also obsessed about writing 'witty' statuses and expects getting a lot of likes and comments. He feels extremely depressed
5 when no one responds to anything he shares.

My mum is slowly withdrawing from her friends, preferring to stay home and tweet random nonsense on Twitter. She is on the app all the time. She is overjoyed when someone re-tweets her posts, and she gets hot under the collar when someone unfollows her.

10 My sister posts every detail of her day on Facebook. It almost seems like she thinks that she is a celebrity. I honestly can't stand her shameless selfies any more! I cringe every time she asks me if I liked her photos yet.

Tomorrow, I'm having lunch with my brother and I already know what to expect. He'll take photos of every dish we order, and I won't be allowed to touch the food until he 15 finishes taking photos from every possible angle. I might even have to remind him to eat. Instead of enjoying the food, he'll spend the entire meal editing the brightness and tone of the photos before posting them on Instagram.

It's my birthday next week and I'm having a celebration dinner with my family. I might use this opportunity to speak to them, but I don't know where to start. Could you 20 please give me some advice?

Anxious Girl

8 May Disconnect to connect

Dear Anxious Girl,

Social media has become an integral part of everyday life. The Ericsson Mobility Report predicts more than 90% of mobile data traffic will come from smartphones in five years' time. According to the Digital in 2017 Global Overview report, there were nearly 2.8 billion global social media users, with more than 2.5 billion doing so via mobile devices. Hong Kong is no exception. As of January 2017, 75% of the population were active social media users.

For social media addicts like your family members, a digital detox might be a viable solution. A digital detox is a period of time a person spends without using smart devices. It aims to help people de-stress and focus on social interaction in the physical world. Instead of setting unattainable goals, I would suggest your family set small limits for each day. For example, they could start with putting away their phones an hour before going to bed or organizing 'phone-free' dinners. This may encourage more conversations and family bonding time.

Disabling push notifications can also help your family kick the habit. Ask them to go through the app list and turn off all non-essential notifications. I am sure you will be amazed how this one little change will dramatically reduce the time they spend on their phones.

I believe your family members seek validation online. From what you described, they seem to feel down if they do not get their desired number of likes or followers. This could be bad for their mental health. Remind them not to let these numbers rule their lives.

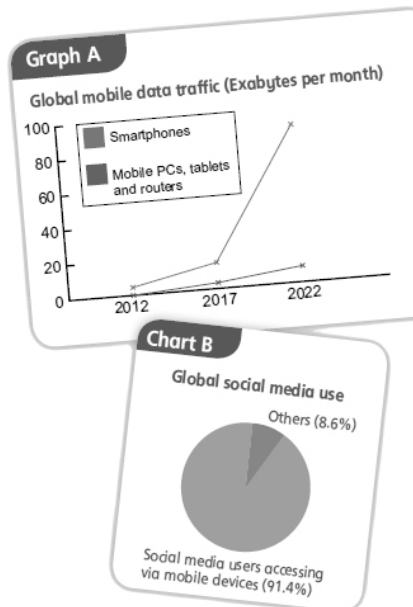

After all, the best connections are the ones made with people who truly like them, not just 'like' them.

Lastly, I am hosting a two-hour workshop on social media addiction next Saturday. The workshop begins at 5 p.m. It is free and open to the public. I think it will be useful for your family to join.

By following my advice, you will have a good time with your family next week and your family can beat social media addiction gradually.

All the best,

Doctor Gloria
