Text 2 Detective story

The Red-Headed League: an adaptation

- 1 One afternoon, I was introduced to a Mr James Wilson as Sherlock Holmes' 'capable associate'. Attempting to act the part, I scrutinized Mr Wilson as he pulled out his phone. Cottoning on to my attempt, Sherlock shook his head.
- 2 'Beyond the likelihood that Mr Wilson's job involves a mobile phone, I see little else.'
- 5 3 'How did you know that?' quizzed Mr Wilson.
- 4 'The clumsy handling of your everyday phone,' Sherlock explained, pointing at Mr Wilson's awkward double-handed grip, 'betrays your unfamiliarity with it. Yet you are proficient in thumb typing, which suggests frequent operation of another device—a work phone, perhaps? Anyway, please begin.'
- 10 5 'Right ... I run my own online shopping platform, but business has been slow. Two months ago, we moved to a cheap basement office. I've cut employees down to a single assistant—on minimum wages too. His name's Spaulding. Last month, he showed me this advertisement.' Mr Wilson handed us his phone.
- 6 'This charity, the Red-Headed League, was hiring a social media
15 marketer. They aim to "combat prejudice against redheads", so the only job requirement was having red hair.'
- 7 'You do have very red hair,' observed Sherlock.
- 8 'That's what Mr Andrews said. He runs the charity. Despite already having a job, he made an exception and hired me.'
- 20 9 'What did the work entail?' Sherlock enquired.
- 10 'Managing the charity's social media account at their office four hours a day. I looked up random redheads and sent friend requests. The monthly pay was high and I was desperate, so although I had no colleagues or meetings, I didn't worry much about it until this 25 morning, when I found a locked office door with this note.'
- 11 Sherlock and I looked at the message, 'the Red-Headed League is disbanded', and burst out laughing at the silliness of it all. Mr Wilson blushed and began to make his leave, but Sherlock interrupted.

- 30 12 'I apologize. Were you able to contact Mr Andrews?'
- 13 'No. The security guard said there was no such person.'
- 14 'Thank you, Mr Wilson. You shall have my opinion within two days.'
- 15 Soon, Sherlock and I found ourselves at the basement office of Mr Wilson's online shopping enterprise. A smart-looking young man answered the door instantly.
- 35 16 'Mr Jones?'
- 17 'No, Spaulding,' the man snapped.
- 18 'Wrong address. Sorry!'
- 19 As we left, I speculated aloud on Spaulding's unwelcoming demeanour.
- 20 'It was his trousers, Watson,' corrected Sherlock. 'They were muddy.'
- 40 21 Sherlock was walking in a bizarre, stomping manner. We rounded the corner behind Mr Wilson's office, passing by a newsagent's, the City Bank and three fashion boutiques. The stomping ended abruptly in a telephone box.
- 22 'A robbery is underway at the City Bank. Two male suspects, average build. Hurry and capture them within the half hour.'
- 45 23 I stared, wide-eyed, as Sherlock hung up.
- 24 'Elementary, Watson,' he explained in his usual self-assured tone. 'It begins with the assistant, who accepted ridiculously low wages in order to pitch an even more ridiculous job to Mr Wilson. Why pay someone handsomely to kill time on a phone? Because he has the reddest hair? Please. They needed him away from his office!'
- 50 25 'So the Red-Headed League ...'
- 26 'Never existed. But what of the motive? Mr Wilson is struggling financially. His office surely contains little of value. What else can one do in a basement? Dig a tunnel, perhaps; that would explain Spaulding's muddy trousers. By stomping on the ground, I determined which direction the tunnel stretched. And guess what's behind Mr Wilson's office?'
- 55 27 'The City Bank!' I exclaimed.
- 28 Sherlock nodded. 'Today's disbanding of the Red-Headed League means Mr Wilson is of no further use. In other words, the tunnel is complete, and our culprits are on the move.'
